

ART & CULTURE: "I Never Wanted To Steal Your Song": The Battle Over Electronic Music's Viral Hit

Surprisingly, two remarkably similar - almost identical - singles both titled 'Miss You' have been battling for attention over the charts and playlists for months: a version by up-and-coming producer Southstar and another one by German established producer Robin Schulz. Even though the vocal used in both versions comes from Oliver Tree's track 'Jerk' and was approved by his record label (Atlantic Records), a single release shouldn't have been done twice: here's how these artists ended up with two versions.

Southstar had been reworking the original track and releasing it on his own without having cleared copyrights from the vocals.

After the massive success of the release, Southstar had been approached by Sony Music and Atlantic Records to help him to clear the song, but meanwhile Robin Schulz had already released the almost copy of Southstar's version, things having gone faster for him since he was already signed to the same record label as Oliver Tree. Besides, Schulz stated that he « never wanted to steal the song » and thought that they would be releasing it together with Southstar.

Whatever the end point of the backstory behind these singles, they are still both in the Top 100 Billboard charts and you can see by yourself which version is your favorite.
